TOLSTOP'S TRAGEDY.

I rend last week a new book on Tolstol, in which the writer dwelt on the unsatisfied longing of that troubled life. Tolstoi ever saw a life that he never lived, and all his books speak of that unfulfilled desire. At last the old man suddealy left home to find a place where he could live as he wished. We all know that he died in the little poor waiting room at the depot.

Most of us have a similar ideal life we would live but never do. We all have things we want to do, and never do. We are so busy with the things about, that we cannot reach the things we long for.

When we have reached about 40 or 50 years, we die at some wayside depot, and have never done or been what we would. MILES HANSON.

Learning To Color Shadows Is Difficult For Amateur Painters

BY RUTH MONRO AUGUR.

will forever kill the notion that shadows must be black.

If ever we have enough snow to cover the ground well, observe it. Snow is a splendial example of the colors in shadows and the absence of black in them.

The disinclination of people to analyze their pet theories by a little open minded observation and study was made very evident to me a few years are, when I attended a meeting of the art department of our local club. At this meeting one of the members read an article on some noted tapestries of Europe. This woman is no longer living in E? Paso, so I am not hurting her feelings by mentioning this. In this paper the club woman commented at considerable length on the peculiarity of one particular inpestry weaver's mind in the reckluse manner in which he used his colors.

Criticles Blue Shadows. den that all shadows are black is one of the greatest difficulties but the artist in color encounters. It ng to think or observe for themselves. Shadows are dark, therefore they must be black, they say, and they lose their eyes to the ingrisd colors in the shadows around them that prolaim that there is color in shadows just as there is color in light. Particularly in regard to shadows on white objects do people seem determined that shadows must be black. There are certain fundamental principles in color that are unchangeable. In out of door work the lights are always warm colors and the shadows cool. A ray of light, split through a prism will show the three primary colors—red, blue and yellow—and the complementary colors, of lavender, orange and grees, which are formed by the combination of two of the primary colors. Red and yellow are called warm colors and blue is the cool color. In the complementary colors, orange is the warm color and lavender and green the cool colors.

Colors Outside and Inside.
Out of doors in the sunshine the lights are invariably warm colorspink, orange and yellow tones—and the shadows are cool—blues, invenders and greens, indoors the opposite is the rule—the lights are cool and the shadows warm. This is particularly evident in white. A white object in the brilliant sunshine will have very warm tones in its lights and almost pure blue for shadows.

The color of the shadows on a white object is influenced to a great extent by objects about it which are reflected in the white, so that in addition to the blue of the shadows there will be lavenders and greens, and frequently a warm tone reflected from some warm colored object near by.

A Color Test.

The color of the shadows on a white object is influenced to a great extent by objects about it which are reflected in the white, so that in addition to the blue of the shadows there will be layendered and greens, and frequently a warm tone reflected from some warm colored object near by.

A Color Test.

A very good way to test the colors is to compare them with black. Walk behind a woman in a white dress carrying a bluek parasol. The more brilliant the sunshine may be upon her white dress and the stronger the contrast between light and shade on it, the more full of color will the shadows be, and without a particle of black in them, either. Comparison of the colors full of color on the white
